Editorial

Dear Reader,

As I've read through the papers contained within this issue, I've been struck again by the way computing technologies are – at an even increasing rate – impacting almost every aspect of the way that we live our lives. This issue, for example contains papers pertaining to the way we look after our money, our children and our homes, and the way we provide and consume entertainment through technological advances in the music industry.

My hope is that you find reading the journal as interesting as I did and that some of the ideas contained within its pages might act as a catalyst for future work.

With best wishes,

Professor Andrew Ware,
